The former Ridgeville United Methodist Church has, c. 1993, been converted for use as office space. The gable-front frame building faces north onto Ridgeville Boulevard, with a three-bay front facade. The center entrance bay stands in a slightly projecting tower. The double six-panel doors, which were surmounted by a stained-glass window in a gothic arch, have been replaced by a modern glazed door with sidelights. A gable-roofed portico has been added to shelter the door. The projecting bay remains, but the former crenelated tower with pointed-arched panels has been removed above the roofline. A single round four-light window in the attic gable has been replaced with a louvered vent. The standing-seam metal roof has been replaced with asphalt shingles. The four stained glass lancet windows on the east and west sides of the nave, the window on either side of the south chancel, the two on its south end, and those flanking the central north entrance have been replaced with standard 1/1 sash windows, and the space above each filled with a blank aluminum sheet. The interior chimney has been removed from the northwest corner of the nave. The 8/8 sash windows in the cellar have been replaced with 1/1 sash, and the interior space has been divided into offices.

Ridgeville M. P. Church
Ridgeville Boulevard

1893; 1940

Ridgeville M. P. Church is more typical of towns of moderate size than of small villages and isolated rural location. The single entrance and central bell tower, while conservative for the period, were not as traditional as a double entrance with no tower. Most unique is the use of a concrete block foundation. If this foundation truly dates to 1893, it must be one of the earliest uses of concrete block in Carroll County. The Ridgeville ceiling, like most metal ceilings, was probably a later alteration, but is still significant. The windows and interior furnishings are being removed, and the integrity of the interior is seriously threatened.

The church is a one-story, three-bay by four-bay structure with a rusticated concrete block foundation, aluminum siding over German siding, and a standing-seam-metal gable roof with a north-south ridge. The north elevation has a projecting center bell tower. The northwest corner of the foundation has a marble stone carved with "Ridgeville Methodist Church Built 1893 Rebuilt 1940." The east and west elevations each have four 8/8 sash in the cellar with four stained-glass lancet windows above. On the south is a one-bay by three-bay, one-story addition. The gabled ceiling has pressed metal with a cove cornice. The church was recently sold and will be converted to commercial space.

The north elevation has a projecting center bell tower with double six-panel doors in a beaded-interior-edge door frame. The doors have sunk panels with ovolo panel moulds. Above the doors is a lanciform stained-glass transom. It has a green outer margin, a purple inner margin, an amber field, a blue tablet with a cross in a crown, and at the bottom "Ridgeville Methodist Church". High up in the tower is a four-light oculus with amber glass. At the top of the tower is a boarded over opening with a triangular top. There is a cross on top of the tower, and battlements at the four corners. On either side of the tower is a stained-glass lancet with a pair of two-panel shutters. The northwest corner of the foundation has a marble stone carved with "Ridgeville Methodist Church Built 1893 Rebuilt 1940."

The east and west elevations each have four 8/8 sash in the cellar with four stained-glass lancet windows above, but the south bay is boarded up. While Ridgeville M. P. Church dates only to 1893, there was apparently a Methodist church in the area long before. The 1862 map shows such a church south of Mt. Airy and another in nearby Parrsville. The latter church was the only one in the vicinity in 1877, and according to Scharf it was a Methodist Episcopal building. The forces that led to the creation of an M. P. church in Ridgeville are unknown, but the structure they built is more typical of towns of moderate size than of small villages and isolated rural locations. The single entrance and central bell tower, while conservative for the period, were not as traditional as a double entrance with no tower. Most unique is the use of a concrete block foundation. Use of such blocks was virtually unknown until after 1900, when the industry took off. If this foundation truly dates to 1893, it must be one of the earliest uses of concrete block in Carroll County. Most original ceilings in churches have been covered over recently, but it still seems that the use of pressed metal was rare. The Ridgeville ceiling, like most metal ceilings, was probably a later alteration, but is still significant. Unfortunately, the church has closed and been sold. It will soon be converted to commercial use. The windows and interior furnishings are being removed, and the integrity of the interior is seriously threatened.

cornerstone with "Ridgeville M.P. Church 1893." The east elevation has one 5/2 lancet sash and a six-panel door to the north, in the cellar.

Inside the bell tower is a vestibule with new six-panel double doors on the west, in an original opening. These lead to stairs down to the cellar. On the east is a single four-panel door into a closet. There is an access hatch in the ceiling of the closet that leads to the bell tower. On the south wall of the closet is a four-panel door into the sanctuary. On the south of the vestibule are new six-panel double doors into the sanctuary. All of the door and window surrounds have two back-to-back shallow ogee mouldings down the center of the field. The sanctuary has three-inch-wide tongue-and-groove pine flooring that runs north-south. The pews have been removed, but there was formerly a center aisle. The baseboard has an ogee moulding on the top and the walls have textured plaster. The gabled ceiling has pressed metal with a cove cornice. Each side of the ceiling has three large, square metal panels that are original. Inside each panel is a square, recessed light. There are two square patches in the cornice, in the center of the east and west walls, that suggest there were once interior chimneys here.

There is a raised dais on the south that has been altered, and the chancel furniture has been removed. Apparently there was originally an altar rail straight across this end, between the south and south-central bays, and it had an opening in the center. The south wall has a recessed, three-sided apse with a small stained-glass lancet on the southeast and southwest sides. These windows match the others, except that they have light green margins. There are two new doors on the south wall into the south addition. This section is divided into two rooms, with knotty pine panelling. The social hall below has no exposed details. The church was recently sold and will be converted to commercial space.
